Horizons gone in shake-up

In a proposed shake-up of local government, Horizons Regional Council would be gone.

The central government reforms – described as a once-in-a-generation overhaul – propose to reshape the local government sector so that 11 regional councils, including Horizons, would be replaced with combined territory boards (CTBs). If adopted, CTBs will be made up of mayors from each district and city council in the region who will take over regional council duties, including environmental management, transport planning, civil defence and Treaty settlement responsibilities.

Horizons Regional Council chair Nikki Riley, who would lose her job if the reforms were implemented, is upbeat. She says they present a opportunity to address long-term issues and create positive outcomes for communities.

"The calls for local government reform have been loud, consistent and come from many different parties – including from regional and unitary councils."

However, she says any change should be in collaboration with regional and unitary councils, given their experience with regional-scale delivery of key services.

"Regional and unitary councils have significant experience in delivering pest control, flood resilience, emergency management, biosecurity and more."

Nikki says there are multiple examples of this in the Horizons region, like flood protection projects recently completed in the Manawatū, Palmerston North, Rangitīkei, Horowhenua and Whanganui regions. Research shows these activities provide the best economic outcomes when delivered at a regional scale, she says.

"Some of the best work we do is in partnership with our communities, outside of the complicated and cumbersome legislation we legally must enforce on behalf of central government.

"Much of the complexity in local government comes from the legislation we operate under. I

"Getting this fix right will create a strong future for regional service delivery and, if done well, create an environment where we can achieve even more with our communities through collaboration thanks to enabling legislation.

– Horizons chair Nikki Riley

"We are facing a scale of reform unlike anything local government has seen for decades. But even as that tsunami arrives, our commitment remains the same – to stay focused on our community's needs, remain open to new ways of working, and make sure we don't become so swamped by change that we miss the big opportunities ahead."

legislation, and the continued rollout of new water entities under Local Water Done Well.

"Taken together, this is a defining moment for the future of local government," Bernie says. "Our job is to stay steady, open to change, whilst ensuring we position Horowhenua to seize the opportunities ahead."

Each region will be required to prepare a regional reorganisation plan within two years. These plans could consider shared services, joint delivery models, or more substantial changes, such as amalgamation.

The proposal has been released this week with a public consultation period closing February 20. The government expects the legislation to be introduced mid-2026 and effective by 2027.

applaud this government for recognising that and for trying to fix it through its resource management reform programme.

"Getting this fix right will create a strong future for regional service delivery and, if done well, create an environment where we can achieve even more with our communities through collaboration thanks to enabling legislation.

"We remain focused on achieving the best outcomes for everyone who lives, works and plays in the Horizons region. This focus will not change, no matter what the future model for regional services delivery ends up being."

Horowhenua Mayor Bernie Wanden says the announcement is part of a much wider "wave" of reforms that will shape how councils operate over coming years.

"We are facing a scale of reform unlike anything local government has seen for decades. But even as that tsunami arrives, our commitment remains the same – to stay focused on our community's needs, remain open to new ways of working, and make sure we don't become so swamped by change that we miss the big opportunities ahead.

- Horowhenua Mayor Bernie Wanden

"Right now, nothing changes for Horowhenua. Our services continue as normal, and we will take the time needed to understand the proposal fully. If there are opportunities to deliver better value, stronger outcomes or more efficient services for our community, then we need to explore those with an open mind."

The announcement lands parallel with other reforms affecting local government, including the System Improvements Bill, rates capping proposals, resource management replacement

Liam tees off with golf simulator

By Paul Williams

Fancy playing a round of golf at St Andrews in Scotland in the morning, then another at Cape Kidnappers that afternoon?

A new indoor golf simulator has opened in Levin town centre this week that gives visitors the choice of playing any of 400 of the world's top golf courses – without the long walk.

Luna Golf Club owner and avid golfer Liam O'Conner opened the doors to the indoor golf simulator, in the space next to Taper Eatery, on Wednesday after months of preparation.

"I've always wanted to own a golf course, so I suppose this is the next best thing," he says.

Liam assembled the indoor course simulator by researching the best components and piecing them together: "I definitely saved money problem solving and doing due diligence."

The experience is very realistic, where players can tee-off into a 7mm-thick screen and watch the ball as it bounces along the fairway. It measures variables like distance, club head speed, spin, ball speed and how far the ball is likely to run.

"As a coaching tool it's next level. The professionals use this technology. It is very accurate at measuring distance, so is great for practice," he says.

A playing group can watch on in comfort with refreshments awaiting their turn. Without the walking, a round of 18 holes could be done and dusted in half the time of a normal round.

"Playing 18 holes by yourself only takes half an hour," he says.

Liam has leased the building from Horowhenua District Council and says already there has been a large amount of interest.

Luna Golf Club is licenced and available for group bookings and coaching sessions. Bring your own clubs, or use clubs and balls provided.

Local government shake-up – what's proposed

The government's sweeping proposals to overhaul the local government system are aimed at simplifying city and regional planning, RMA Minister Chris Bishop said on Tuesday.

The government argues that the current system is bogged down by duplication, disagreements, and decisions that often defy common sense.

Central to the proposals is the introduction of a new planning system, which aims to strip out duplication, standardise processes, and reduce complexity and compliance costs. Under the new system, there would be fewer plans, fewer consent categories, and fewer consents overall. Regional councils like Horizons would see their roles significantly reduced.

There are two key proposals:

1. Abolishing regional councillors – Elected regional councillors would be replaced by combined territories boards (CTBs), made up of mayors from the region's city and district councils. The government says this would empower mayors to collaborate on regional governance, streamline decision-making, and reduce unnecessary bureaucracy. Decisions would be made through a population-based voting system, ensuring smaller communities' voices are heard. For resource management, a dual threshold aims to ensure both urban and rural interests are represented.

2. Locally led regional reorganisation – CTBs would lead the development of regional reorganisation plans, assessing how councils can best work together to deliver efficient infrastructure and services. Options could include shared services, council-owned companies, or merging territorial authorities. Plans would be tested against national priorities and must deliver better services at lower cost. Final plans would be approved by the Local Government Minister.

'Brilliant' students in Imaginate

By Paul Williams

A group of students from Foxton Primary School were the first to see an art work on display at Te Awahou Neiuwe Stroom designed to bring people joy.

Their smiling faces feature on a work by multi-media artist Warwick Smith titled Let's Face It, We're All Unique, part of a collaborative exhibition called Imaginate involving 28 artists.

exhibition called Imaginate involving 28 artists Warwick approached principal Jo How with the idea and says the students were brilliant.

"I couldn't have asked for more," he says.
"They were the faces I was looking for. It really blew me away."

The seven students were the first to see the work exhibited and he says their reaction was priceless.

"For me that was the best thing. It's just fun and makes people smile and realise we are beautiful in who we are. There is so much negativity around and it's good just to get people smiling because we need more of it. It was seriously fun.

"What I love about kids is it takes the politics out of it. They're just free and not hung up about adult things and not trying to say something politically. They just get it.

"We get so busy teaching kids to be adults. When you get older the world doesn't seem as much fun as it used to be. We can all learn from kids"

He wanted a work that was "fun" and "hands on". The inspiration came from a recent exhibition involving smells.

"I was taken aback. I thought never again do you have to be passive," he says.

He says art is for everyone. He loved that whānau and locals were checking out Imaginate.

Warwick's interest in photography sparked during his time working in industrial design, leading to a career in photojournalism, while using the medium as an artist to explore contemporary social issues.

He says visual storytelling when executed well can inform, educate and sometimes be a catalyst for change.

Te Awahou Nieuwe Stroom's former onsite manager, Liz Tomescu, came up with the idea and name Imaginate, to have fun creating and making art for art's sake, being in the moment and bringing joy.

Exhibit curator and artist Sarah-Jane Shine says there was a huge response after a request for expressions of interest. The final exhibition is a collaboration of works using a variety of mediums.

The exhibition runs until February 20. A series of creative workshops is planned as part

Milla finalist for Fred Hollows award

Levin School student Milla Burfield is a finalist in the annual Fred Hollows Humanity Awards, which recognise young New Zealanders making a positive difference in their communities.

Milla, 9, was nominated by teacher Ruth Crotty for her compassion, commitment to others, and leadership in Levin School's Eco Legends group.

"Milla is so kind to other students," Ruth says. "She quietly helps out and looks out for others. She empathises and puts the needs of others before her own, giving up her free time to help and welcome new students. Levin School is so proud of Milla. She has worked really hard in Eco Legends. It is an honour to have a finalist at our school."

As part of Eco Legends, Milla (at right) visits classrooms, collects soft plastics for recycling and helps students understand what can and can't be collected. She is known for encouraging others, especially children who might be feeling shy, and bringing them into the group.

Milla says finding out she was a finalist was a special moment: "When I got short-listed for the Fred Hollows award, I couldn't stop smiling."

Milla was selected from a large number of nominations nationwide, joining eight other finalists. The overall winner – who will become this year's Fred Hollows Humanity Awards Junior Ambassador – will be announced tomorrow (Saturday).

The global awards celebrate young people who show compassion, integrity and kindness in their everyday lives – values lived by the late Professor Fred Hollows, founder of The Fred Hollows Foundation. Anyone aged 9–11 can be nominated by a teacher, coach, community leader or family member.

Floodgates technology impresses at open day

By Janine Baalbergen

The community had a chance last Saturday to see the Moutoa Floodgates up close, close enough to have a peek through one of the gates to the other side.

The land in front and beyond was devoid of water, of course. Visitors to the open day were impressed with the technology involved in the gates' operation.

The height of the water in the Manawatū River is closely monitored, especially during heavy rainfalls and when the water that spills out of the river into the floodway in front of the gates reaches 8 metres high the gates are slowly opened.

When all gates are open 2500 cubic metres of water rushes through every second and the water level in the river, which also must cope with tidal influences, then drops, eventually, by 2 metres.

The gates were built in response to a flood in 1941 and completed in 1962. Each gate is 4.5m high, 125m wide and each weighs 22 tonnes.

Horizons Regional Council, which is in charge of the gates, had upgrades done earlier in the year, which include the addition of a radar system that motors water levels in front of the gates.

The overhead powerlines, which hung over the gates, were moved away from the floodgates, with help from Electra, to make access to the tops of the gates easier and safer.

Project team leader Diandri showed groups of visitors around and explained the history. She said the gates were valued at $50m. Interestingly, given the size and weight of each gate, she said they are opened using just a 1.5 kilowatt motor on each gate.

The effect of rainfall was demonstrated so visitors could see how rain and irrigation influences river levels.

Visitors to last weekend's open day are dwarfed by floodgate

Kapinua – keeping workforces safe and professional

S THE MUCH-ANTICIPATED Ōtaki to ANorth Levin (Ō2NL) highway project moves into full swing, hundreds of contractors - from road crews to heavymachinery operators - will be working in dynamic, high-risk environments.

At Levin-based Kapinua, their mission is simple: to ensure every worker on site is equipped with high-quality, certified gear that keeps them safe, visible, and comfortable, while representing their company with pride.

Kapinua has decades of experience supplying uniforms and safety apparel across Aotearoa. The company is uniquely positioned to support contractors involved in roading, earthmoving, civil engineering, concrete work, landscaping, traffic management, and all manner of heavy-equipment operation.

Whether your team is operating diggers, graders, compactors, or trucks, Kapinua understands that reliable clothing isn't optional – it's essential.

The company provides a full suite of certified high-visibility garments suitable for day-use only, or combined day-andnight use, meeting the rigorous safety standards required on major transport infrastructure sites. From breathable hivis tees and long-sleeves to waterproof jackets and durable work trousers, their apparel is built for the realities of long shifts and fast-changing conditions.

For teams exposed to dust, debris, vibration, and noise, they also supply essential PPE, including helmets, gloves, and protective goggles – gear that stands up to the demands of the job.

But safety equipment is only part of the Many companies working on O2NL need their crews to reflect professionalism and unity on site. That's why Kapinua offers comprehensive uniform embellishment services, including embroidery, screenprinting, heat-press transfers, and full custom branding.

Whether you need a simple logo on high-vis vests or a complete branded apparel package for your entire workforce, their in-house production team creates sharp, long-lasting finishes designed to withstand harsh outdoor conditions.

Although the O2NL project is front-ofmind for many local businesses this year, Kapinua continues to support all trades and industries throughout the region from electricians, plumbers, and builders to fabricators, logistics companies, and agricultural operators. If your team needs uniforms, safetywear, or branded work apparel - whether or not you're involved in highway construction – Kapinua is here

As the new highway takes shape, safety, visibility, and professional presentation will be more important than ever.

Kapinua is proud to stand alongside the contractors building our region's future, ensuring every worker goes home safe, seen, and supported.

If your business is preparing teams for Ō2NL or any other project, now is the perfect time to gear up with Kapinua locally made, locally trusted, and built for the work that shapes our communities.

Wildlife trust expands services

By Janine Baalbergen

The Foxton Wildlife Trust is expanding its services, especially since its move to larger premises at Foxton Beach.

"It was always the plan for us to start an environmental hub," says trustee Nola Fox.

The trust has moved to 207 Seabury Avenue, just past the bowling club, which is the former Senior Citizens Club. While still providing activities for the over-60s, Foxton Wildlife is hoping to revive its native plant nursery and the wildlife nursery, among other things Senior Citizens Foxton Beach will not be re-registering next year and has donated the building to the trust. The building is on reserve land owned by Horowhenua District Council.

For the over 60s there is still pool, boardgames, snooker, mahjong, indoor bowls, board games on Mondays and Wednesdays from 1-4pm.

The building is large enough to be base for other organisations such as Forest and Bird, Save Our River Trust (Sort), the water quality work group, and Foxton Lionesses.

Groups can book the facility as needed.

The building now hosts displays about the Manawatū Estuary, and recycling.

"Things that the kerbside recycling does not take can also be recycled here," says Nola.

"That includes blisterpacks, small batteries, pens and markers, disposable razors and hair products. This is free to the general public, but a small donation would be appreciated as the trust runs on volunteers."

Nola says the trust could also do with some more volunteers, such as a coordinator for the beach litter collections. They can also use help with the activities for senior citizens.

Foxton Wildlife trustee Nola Fox, and (above right) the recycling facility in the new trust premises at Foxton Beach.

Eventually the native plant nursery will be set up again, which would require more volunteers, too.

"We have found that plants grown elsewhere don't do so well [here]. It's better for us to grow plants here. Their survival rate is much greater."

The trust has a backyard trapping programme along the sunset walkway catching lots of rats and mice. Recently a stoat was caught in Palmer Road and there are reports of a stoat "shopping" at the Hammer Hardware store in Main Street.

"It could have come in from the Loop, but we don't know," Nola says.

Foxton Wildlife Trust has 3-4 staff and is open three days a week. That will soon be four days, Monday to Thursday mornings.

Look out for the elusive katipo around the beaches

The breeding season for the katipō spider – the only spider to have a Māori name – is about now, but casual beach-goers are unlikely to see one.

Katipō are on the endangered species list, the victim of shifting sands, rising tides and human activities.

Te Papa's curator of invertebrates, Phil Sirvid, has visited Foxton Beach at the invitation of Foxton Wildlife Trust. He knows quite a bit about the elusive spider, which he shared with occasional Star contributor Bruce Falloon.

Katipo latrodectus is a member of the widow family of spiders, which includes black and brown widows, and the Australian redback. It was first being documented in New Zealand in 1870.

Phil said there were two different kinds of katipō – red and black. The most common is the red katipō.

They like to live among river dunes and their grasses, and around driftwood. Foxton Beach is an ideal environment for them.

The female katipō is larger than the male, about the size of a garden pea with a distinguishing red stripe down the length of the abdomen and a thin white stripe on each side of it.

"The male is slightly smaller and has a pale yellow stripe with a thin white stripe each side of that – this being the difference in identifying both sexes of this spider."

Katipō eat earwigs, slaters, beetles of various types, flies, moths, grasshoppers, wasps any unlucky insects that might be passing by.

Reproduction of the katipō is about during November-December. The egg sacs appear under the female's abdomen 4-6 weeks after mating. She lays about 10 eggs over the summer period.

Katipō have a reputation as a dangerous spider because of its venom, but bites are rare. It's a shy, timid spider, and no-one has died from a bite since 1923. A bite, however, can lead to intense pain that spreads from the site, causing sweating, nausea, abdominal cramps, headache fever, and high blood pressure. Symptoms can last a few hours or several days.

Only the adult female is capable of biting humans, and she typically only does so as a last resort if she is trapped or accidentally squashed.

A safe and effective antivenom is available in hospitals and medical centres for both katipō (and redback) bites.

PEOPLE'S POLITICS: PHIL MALPAS

How the power of our belief systems shapes our logic

From childhood, we are introduced to belief before we are introduced to logic.

The Tooth Fairy, Father Christmas, and early religious stories teach us that unseen forces reward us, watch us, or care for us. As adults, we look back and recognise these as illusions – gentle ones, perhaps, but illusions nonetheless.

Yet the mechanism they establish remains with us. It shapes how we understand reality, how we assess truth, and how we give meaning to the systems around us.

Each person builds a belief system from these early inputs. Some beliefs are grounded in logic, evidence, and lived experience. Others are anchored entirely in feeling – a sense of certainty that feels "real" even when it isn't. This blend of emotion and logic shapes how we interpret everything: risk, reward, trust, and value.

An example is Lotto. Recently, a $45 million prize was promoted and 1.2 million tickets were sold. The odds of winning? 1:38,383,800. Statistically insignificant. Yet belief – hope – drives participation.

I personally have absolute certainty that I won't hold the winning ticket. But 1.2 million people believe they might. Logic takes a backseat to belief when the emotional reward is powerful enough.

Money operates on the exact same principle. Logically, value attaches only to the tangible – things that can be used, consumed, or experienced. Money itself has no intrinsic value. It's a human invention, sustained only by collective belief that the numbers printed on paper or displayed on screens represent something

But belief makes it function. Belief makes it powerful. Belief makes it central to our very survival.

This is why economists often call money "the most successful story humans have ever told one another".

The persistence of these beliefs isn't accidental. Governments, financial institutions, and media reinforce them, because the system depends on it. In this sense, belief is not just personal – It is engineered, cultivated, and continuously maintained.

Once we recognise that many of our most deeply held societal "truths" are held together by shared belief rather than logic, we gain something important – agency.

If the value of money, the meaning of status, the structure of power, and the rules of the economy are built on belief, then they can be reshaped. New systems – co-operative, equitable, sustainable – are possible. They require belief, too, but aligned with collective benefit rather than individual profit.

If our world is built on shared stories, which stories do we want to keep believing in? And which should we replace with something better?

The answers to those questions determine not just how we understand value today, but the kind of society we could create tomorrow.

 Phil is a writer and advocate for cooperative systems and sustainable energy. His blogs can be found at Substack com

CITIZENS ADVICE: GINNY WILLIAMS

Total Mobility scheme helps people stay connected

My mother has given up her driver's licence but still needs to get around for shopping and socialisation. What can she do to retain her independence?

The Total Mobility scheme reduces the cost of taxi services for of taxi services for eligible people who have a permanent disability and can't independently use regular public transport, all or some of the time. The scheme covers physical, sensory, neurological, psychological, mental/psychiatric, cognitive, and intellectual impairment.

You will need to get an assessment done, and each regional council sets its own criteria for the assessments.

What you can get if you are eligible?

If you're eligible, you will get an electronic card or vouchers that allow you to get a discount of up to a 75% on taxi rides, up to a maximum fare. The maximum fare is set by your regional council. You must use one of the approved taxi companies for the scheme.

If you have a carer, you can get subsidised taxi travel for both of you when you travel together.

The scheme also provides:

- funding to scheme providers to help buy and install wheelchair hoists
- payment to the owner of the wheelchair accessible vehicle for each Total Mobility scheme member who requires the use of a wheelchair hoist or ramp.

You can use your Total Mobility card or vouchers in many places in New Zealand. If you use an electronic card, check whether you need to get some taxi vouchers before you travel. If you use a Total Mobility electronic card, and you're travelling to a region that uses vouchers rather than an electronic card, get some vouchers before you travel. At least 10 days before you travel, contact the regional council (or regional transport authority) for the region you will be travelling to, and ask them to mail you some.

These regions use electronic cards: Auckland, Wellington, Christchurch, Otago, Waikato, Hawke's Bay, Manawatū–Whanganui, Nelson/Tasman, Marlborough, Bay of Plenty, Northland and Taranaki.

When you're away from home, tell the driver you are from out of town, and that you are using a card or vouchers from another region. Do this at the start of the ride.

Each region in New Zealand has different rules, so you need to check with your local council and find out what their rules are.

In the Horowhenua district we come under Horizons Regional Council rules. Please telephone Age Concern in Horowhenua (06 367 2181) or email admin@ageconcernhoro.co.nz and talk to staff about an application.

THE ELECTORATE: SUZE REDMAYNE

Awards highlight local excellence

As we head towards the end of another year, plenty is happening both here in the Horowhenua and in Wellington.

With the House sitting under urgency last week, it's been a busy time in Parliament as we work through important legislation before the summer break. Back home, communities are also in full swing with school prize-givings, community celebrations and local awards. It's fantastic there is so much happening, and I wish I could make it to everything

One recent highlight was the Levin Civic and Youth Excellence Awards, which celebrated the many ways people contributed to Horowhenua. Three people were recognised with Civic Honours and another four with Certificates of Recognition. My congratulations to Mary Davis, Jeffrey Paulin, Wayne and Debra Kaye, along with Corey Prouting, Frank Taylor, Jack Gibson and Robert Ropata Remihana.

Fifteen young people received Youth Excellence Scholarships in recognition of hard work and leadership. A big congratulations to Haewon Kim, Hunter Kahukuranui Pakau, Pusa Fonoti and Saoirse Williamson who received Arts and Culture Scholarships; Tyson Jones, Sienna Laplanche, Dycen Taituha and Owen Winstanley who received Community Service Scholarships; William Dunsmore, Fletcher Warren, Anahera Easton and Finn Pedersen who received Sports Scholarships; Tareesha Kiran, Liam Roach and Youan Salt who received Academia Scholarships.

It was fantastic to see Horowhenua NZ Trust's "Project Lift Horowhenua" among seven projects to receive support in the first round of the government's Social Investment Fund. This initial $50 million investment will > back programmes reaching more than 1600 children, from newborns through to 18-yearolds. Alongside colleague Tim Costley it was a pleasure to support the Trust's bid, and we're thrilled for Antony Young and his team.

Project Lift partners with 19 schools to help students who have been repeatedly stood down or suspended. Initiatives include reacclimatisation classes for younger learners, trauma support in secondary schools and an after-school programme.

It's been encouraging to see some positive national news about our young people recently. A new approach to teaching maths currently being trialled is lifting achievement and showing outstanding early results. In just 12 weeks, years 7-8 students who had been falling behind made one to two years of progress with our intensive support programme.

New research from the Education Review Office also shows our decision to ban cell phones in schools is making a difference. Students are more focused, behaviour has improved and bullying has reduced. Teachers are seeing the benefits, too, with 79% reporting better concentration in class, 61% seeing improved achievement, 77% noting better behaviour and 69% reporting less bullying.

I'm often in Horowhenua on my way to Parliament, so if you're from a local organisation, school or business and would like to catch up, please get in touch - Suze. RedmayneMP@parliament.govt.nz. You can also follow me on Facebook at facebook.com/SuzeRedmayneMP.

Countdown begins for launch into election

Chocks away, and cleared for take-off! The political parties are into election mode 10-11 months before the official start for campaigning.

POLITICS

BRUCE KOHN

Hopefully by this time next year we will have a clear idea who will steward the country's governance through to the eve of the next decade.

National is in an early festive season policy announcement period. NZ First chips away with a combination of political party pinpricking and encouragement of the public to believe it holds the key to sensible policy implementation. Labour tests the water of policy attractiveness. Act takes a plague on all your policies approach. The Greens try to portray relevance and Te Pati Maori steadfastly keeps on a track of malevolence toward one another that leads to Coherence of messaging appears to lie with the parties of the governing coalition. Labour seemingly knows what it is against but appears unsettled on prescriptions for correcting the ills it believes exist. It faces a hectic six-month period of policy analysis to determine the final shape of its projected policy programme.

Against this background it is imperative that all parties recognise the public demand for clarity of intent. It should be reflected in publication of detailed manifestos setting out their visions for New Zealand and how they plan to achieve it.

As Prime Minister Christopher Luxon has been lambasted by critics for a failure to lead the nation's political conversations on policy implementation. It would be fair to say, however, that when he spoke last weekend to some 200 National Party members from lower North Island areas, including Horowhenua, no-> one left the Silverstream Retreat with doubts on what he and his colleagues want to achieve.

In talking up an economic programme based around achieving greater productivity and growth he was talking to committed "Nats" fully supportive of the aims he set out.

There was enthusiasm. There was no evidence of dissent in subsequent discussion, formal or informal. Absence in his presentation were a clear statement of "vision" and a placement of intended actions in the context of their contribution to achieving the goal.

These omissions are easily fixed, and need to be for presentations beyond committed faithful.

It is relevant that the governing parties have an information advantage over the opposition trio. While this applies particularly to current government activities it also offers up nuggets of negative background on former Labour administration actions that may come to haunt those who were ministers in the Ardern-Hipkins years of office during the campaign proper.

Among matters other than economic, education and health that may come to the fore as electioneering hots up are defence and foreign policy, often considered as ones that fit into the lower echelon of public attention during election campaigns. Kiwi involvement in the Vietnam war, the Clark government's decision to scrap the Air Force fighter wing and David Lange's "no" to nuclear warship port calls were notable exceptions.

But looming as a potential generator of community debate is the nation's acceptance of the role that space technologies will have in defence security. It is a debate that will likely directly encompass elements of defence policy and indirectly impact future nuances of foreign policy implementation. Reality, however, is that space is now caught up in big power rivalry.

New Zealand cannot escape it. The country needs a form of security protection in the South Pacific within the zone to the north-east not directly covered with intensity by Australia and America. This can probably be forthcoming through security exchanges with the United States, utilising America's "eyes in the skies" for surveillance and potentially laser or other highly sophisticated space weaponry.

That New Zealand's own space capabilities should be absent from such a defence system would seem both unlikely and out of alignment with security needs. But groups within the country have often been outspoken in resisting new lethal defence technologies even though they are regarded internationally as a normal and justifiable reaction to the potential of other nations' military capabilities.

The Greens and Labour may well have differing views to those of the coalition partners on the use of New Zealand's space industry capabilities. And, if so, the stage is well set for a country-wide debate no less feisty than those which accompany policies dealing with asset sales, the health system and capital gains taxes.

With new military aircraft and naval ships costing eye-watering amounts that strain the budgets of countries of New Zealand's size, the attraction of space technology defence systems as an alternative is clear. The fact that the country has one of the world's most advanced space exploration industries adds to that appeal.

Koha turns 25 - A world-class Horowhenua invention

By Wendy Fraser Library Services Manager

Not everyone in Horowhenua might know this, but one of the world's most widely used library systems was created right here in our district.

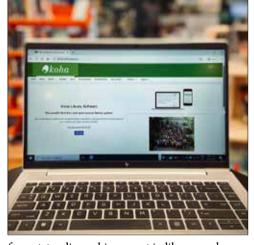

Twenty-five years ago our local library service launched Koha, the world's first open-source library management system. What began as a practical response to the Y2K challenge is now powering libraries in more than 50 countries, including the British Library in the UK, as well as libraries throughout the United States, Canada, Singapore, and Turkey.

Back in 1999, Horowhenua libraries were facing serious technology limitations. The system we were using was outdated and expensive to maintain, and it wasn't going to survive the turn of the century. After exploring commercial options that proved either unaffordable or ill-suited to our community, the decision was made to invest in building something new – something that would work for Horowhenua.

In partnership with Wellington-based Katipo Communications, a new system was developed from the ground up. It was designed to be webbased, adaptable, and flexible enough to support multiple library branches. And in a move that was both visionary and generous, it was released as open source – meaning it could be freely shared and improved by anyone.

Koha officially went live in January 2000. Word soon spread among the library community, and interest grew quickly. Over the years, librarians and developers from around the world have contributed to Koha's development, making it more powerful, more accessible, and more widely used.

The impact of Koha was quickly recognised in Aotearoa as well. In 2000, Koha received New Zealand's prestigious 3M Innovation Award for outstanding achievement in library and information services — a testament to the bold thinking and practical innovation that made the system possible.

Today, thousands of libraries globally use Koha to manage their collections, memberships, and daily operations. From major institutions like the British Library and the National Library of Singapore to small rural and community libraries, Koha has proven itself to be flexible, reliable, and widely adaptable. Here in Horowhenua, it remains the backbone of our library service. It supports everything from book borrowing to online access, helps us stay modern and responsive to the needs of our community, and continues to be a cost-effective and sustainable solution for managing library resources.

As we mark 25 years of Koha, we reflect with pride on the role our district played in its creation. We recognise the early innovators who saw the need for a better system, and we honour the many library staff who have supported and maintained Koha over the years. Most importantly, we acknowledge the ongoing support of Horowhenua District Council, which continues to invest in innovative, community-led services like our libraries.

To our local community – thank you for supporting your libraries. Every time you borrow a book, use our catalogue, or access digital services, you are part of a world-leading story that began right here in Horowhenua. EXHIBITIONS

Weraroa take historic shield

By Paul Williams

Weraroa have claimed the historic Hugh Hall Shield for the first time since the summer of 2012 with a resounding win against Kāpiti Old Boys at Paraparaumu Domain last weekend.

Sent in to bat by KOB, it was English import Harry Kendal who carried the day - a fine 100 brought up with a scoop shot over the wicketkeeper's head. He went on to score 106.

Cameos came from Blake De Burgh (49), while a patient 12 from 66 balls by Keegan Maclachlan helped Harry to continue scoring and enabled Weraroa to reach 246 by late afternoon on Saturday.

The Weraroa bowling attack was outstanding in reply. Jaedyn Dawson again was a force with the ball, the speedster ending with figures of 6-65, working brilliantly in tandem with Caleb O'Connell, who bagged 3-62.

The pair have themselves fit and able to bowl long spells, and apart from opener Daniel Franks with 51, the KOB top order were wellcontained. They were all out for 170.

Kāpiti captain Zack Benton conceded defeat late in the second day after Weraroa managed to compile a second innings total of 187 runs and their tail wagging stubbornly.

The win was just reward for a nucleus of players who had toiled hard behind the scenes, led by Keeghan Machlachlan and Jamie Marshall, who are also club president and club captain respectively.

The winning Weraroa team.

The pair had worked hard with a committee to grow participation. The club is now in good heart, boasting three senior teams and several junior teams.

The future for Weraroa looks bright – while the average age of the senior team is less than 23, the likes of Locky Spring, Jaydyn Dawson, Blake de Burgh and Caleb O'Connell have years of senior cricket under their belts.

This season has marked a return from serious back injuries for bowler Jaedyn and batsman Blake, both aged 23. Both are talented cricketers and each comeback is a credit to their commitment to rehabilitation, as it was doubtful either would play cricket again.

It was the 115th edition of the Hugh Hall Shield, one of the oldest surviving trophies in New Zealand club cricket. It was first introduced in 1909 in honour of Levin Borough councillor Hugh Hall. The shield has been contested ever since, with only a brief hiatus during the First World War.
